But the present and future of the Upper Egypt dam remains an unresolved problem. A woman who was submerged in the reservoir of the Upper Egypt dam for nearly seven hours in late August became the latest to be found by emergency workers. Rescuers in a helicopter found the woman, who had no airways, two hours after they sent an Egyptian army patrol down to the reservoir. The survival of the dam's other eight survivors is also at risk, with a deadline set for teams to complete their efforts to enter all the chambers of the dam that are flooded to build an anti-slip wall. The dam is located near the city of Aswan, where the construction of the dam in the 1970s is a controversial issue. Archaeologists have been trying to unearth information from ancient times surrounding the building of the dam to see the damage to the ancient city of Aswan and its cultural heritage. A 2013 report by an official international committee that was convened to inspect the Upper Egypt dam said the works needed to be halted immediately due to the inadequate knowledge about the dam's history. Aswan, which is home to the first underwater archaeological exploration and the oldest continuously used commercial port in the world, was a strategic point for the development of imperial Egypt. It served as a religious center and the main transit for pilgrims to the major mosques, including the most famous, the Grand Mosque, as well as local agricultural and trade centers. It was abandoned during the Islamic and later Ottoman periods. From the 1930s to 1970, British engineers and stonemasons successfully built the ancient city of Aswan as a huge archaeological site. It became a UNESCO World Heritage site in 1988. Aswan served as the site for the construction of the dam at its upper part, because it was the safest site in the country for building a dam. Aswan is located at the south of the Nile River, where it passes close to the Aswan dam, which is constructed at the eastern end of Lake Nasser.
