connected thereto by tie rods, the die base and the lower frame being mechanically coupled by hydraulic cylinders, the lower frame and the die base being vertically movable together, one on the other, by hydraulic cylinders, and the lower frame and the die base being clamped together at the upper end of the hydraulic cylinders, that is, at a tie rod connection between the lower frame and the die base, by a U-bolt connection. A press such as that of the present invention is known from European Patent Disclosure No. 0,032,518. There, the tie rod connection between the lower frame and the die base is clamped together by locking clamping bars, the U-bolts of which engage in apertures in the lower frame and the die base. The frame and the die base are loaded with clamping force by displaceable locking arms which engage in the frame or in the die base and which are used to prevent the locking clamps from rotating. One of the locking arms acts directly on the U-bolts of the connecting rods. Another locking arm is coupled by a linking link to a locking arm of a further U-bolt, which further U-bolt is displaced by a direct-acting hydraulic cylinder coupled to the die base. The object of the present invention is to provide a press of the above-described type which is simple to build and which allows a self-locking relative movement of the die base and the lower frame.

The findings, which are published in Evolutionary Applications, also illustrate the danger to this endangered animal. Armadillos are native to South America, Central America, and the Caribbean, where they are primarily tropical grassland animals. Due to the wide distribution and life history traits, armadillo
